Amphotericin B modified by formaldehyde and ammonia: its effects on the formaldehyde-induced fluorescence and antimicrobial activities. Amphotericin B has been modified by formaldehyde and ammonia, and the effects of the treatment on the formaldehyde-induced fluorescence and antimicrobial activities have been examined. The extent of the fluorescence quenching was proportional to the molar ratio of formaldehyde and ammonia used for the treatment. The minimum concentration of formaldehyde to reduce the fluorescence intensity to 90% was 2 mM, which corresponded to 50% loss of activity. Treatment with 4 mM formaldehyde for 24 h destroyed the antifungal activity against Candida albicans, C. glabrata and C. parapsilosis, and also the hemolytic activity against human red blood cells. However, treatment with 10 mM formaldehyde for 24 h did
