television seriesQ: Do
all zlib streams use a similar compression/dec ompression algorithm?

I'm using the zip module in Python 3.4, and I noticed that the documentation for the zlib module says that I can get an object that implements a zlib object interface:

>>> import zip
>>> z = zip.ZipFile('/path/to/a.zip',
>>> 'r')
>>> zlib = z.get_zlib()
>>> len(zlib) == len(z)
True

>>> zlib.closed True

I understand that zip implements a filesystem abstraction that handles reading and writing the files to which it has access, but it looks like the documentation for zlib is telling me that there's a zlib object present in that ZipFile, and that it supports both compression and decompression. Is there any reason that it's not true of all zlib streams? Is it possible that the object I'm seeing in the zip module is just an object wrapper around the zlib object, and is implementing a filesystem interface, but it does not actually implement the compress ion/decompression algorithms itself? A: The zlib module is a pure Python interface to the zlib library. It provides a C extension for python that allows you to use the library in python. Q: Wordpress - function hook for custom post type update I am trying to create a function that will be called when the custom post type is updated (to be used in an AJAX script that adds custom fields to the post).

When I try to use this code:

function new_custom_post_type_update( $post_id ) { update_post_meta( $post_id, 'test', 'test' ); } add_action( '2d92ce491b'
