On Apple devices running the iOS and iPadOS operating systems, jailbreak is a privilege escalation exploit performed to remove software restrictions. The main goal of the attackers is to provide the ability to modify the operating system and various applications on Apple devices under the guise of software updates and download them using iTunes. Another reason for creating a jail (as well as jailing a device) is a software update, but on users' hardware devices with a too slow Internet channel, installing an update can lead to processor overheating and even device failure. A jailbreak is a change in the code of a program, including the operating system, which should help improve its security, reduce the cost of accelerator programs, and fix bugs. Thanks to this, attackers can take control of the user's system and gain access to critical information. Currently, large jails for mobile platforms, as they say, "at the top" do not exist. The problem with the incompatibility of "heavy" devices and iOS applications on them has always existed, but jails involve modifying only the computer software, not the hardware, so they do not require emulation of the processor load and load of the device hardware. Scientists from the University of California at San Diego have been experimenting with various algorithms and techniques for hacking iTak Restore for several years to make sure that it is not enough to hack the software itself, but download a separate executable file. As a result, they managed to find a way to bypass the integrity check of the OS, which takes place during the installation stage of the equipment (android smartphones, 4.x and 6.x phones). Scientists have shown that on top of iTak Restore, they "bring to mind" applications designed for iOS devices, but do not affect memory. This, in turn, allows you to work without failure in the system and at the same time collect the necessary information. Such studies are reminiscent of the methods of creating jabber servers based on running client programs on different computers or servers, but, importantly, in this case there is no need even to remove the system, because it just reloads when the server comes up. Jail technology is very similar to Xen (more about the program - here), but unlike it, it has a number of features. For example, a message about the successful launch of the program
