Cactus Timer: Time Tracking for Multiple Timers. Accurately keeping track of your daily activities, both professional and personal, can very well mean the difference between you being productive or just having a very bad day. Thankfully, nowadays there are a ton of comprehensive and good apps and web apps that can help you with this particular task. However, sometimes a simple, good old time tracking app is enough to do the job. One such application is Cactus Timer, a utility that allows you to easily track your activities thanks to its support for multiple timers. Straightforward and efficient, little productivity timer

Another great thing about Cactus Timer is its built-in archive tool which makes it possible for you to concurrently keep track of various activities that span over multiple sessions. Once launched, you can add new timers by clicking the Plus button from the lower-left corner of the main window. In terms of features, it's safe to say that Cactus Timer is one of the simplest apps of this sort out there.

You can add an unlimited number of timers that can be active all at once, add various colors to them to help them visually organized, and tweak various timers in order to meet your needs. Any timer can be added to the Archive list and, once archived, it can also be shared or exported to formats such as Comma Separated Values (CSV) and Tab Separated Values (TSV). Cactus Timer is a simple, straightforward application that's ideal for anyone who is looking for a means of managing their time while tracking professional and personal activities, as well as other everyday errands. The application offers two different types of timers, the one that lets you easily keep track of your current activities while working on them and a more advanced kind that allows you to plan your day and set reminders. As for the former, you can add time while you are on the move and it will be automatically synced to the cloud. You also have the ability to export your timer activities in a variety of formats that allow you to work offline, so you won't have to wait for an Internet connection. Finally, this simple, straightforward application also allows you to keep track of multiple timers concurrently. They are all automatically archived, as mentioned earlier, and you can share the list, or export it as Comma Separated Values (CSV) and Tab Separated Values (TSV). If you're interested in keeping track of your time and making sure that you don't waste any of it, then Cactus Timer is definitely a great choice. The HTC Sense UI is a cross between the Android OS and the HTC Sense UI. This means that it combines the versatility of an OS with the niceties of a Touch-based UI. However, you're not stuck with an all-or-nothing approach - you have a choice between the two UI types in each and every one of the apps.

Regardless of the UI version used, the apps that come with the HTC Sense UI are sleek and streamlined, and the number of pre-installed apps that you're offered to install is unlimited. Here's a quick rundown of what to expect from the HTC Sense UI: The fonts are pretty big and very legible, but you can also customize the font size. There are no app permissions - so your privacy is maintained. This isn't a bad thing either, as there's no extra code to manage or upload Unless you're using the HTC Sense UI for its apps, you don't need to be bothered about all those small icons floating around your screen. You'll be downloading any applications you may need offline anyway Some apps may share the same name across the different UI versions, but it won't affect the functionality, so you're good to go. The apps that are available across the different HTC Sense UI versions are listed as follows: App name Description 6a5afdab4c

Tips: - Choosing the right timer method depends on the type of activity you want to track. For example, if you need to track your time on Facebook, a browser extension is the best option as it allows you to have an unobtrusive access to Facebook and still keep track of what you do there. However, if you have to monitor your time on the Internet in general, a Cactus Timer app is still the best solution to opt for. - Track the time for each individual activity by pressing the Plus button next to the activity of your choice and then choose an existing time or create a new one. - You can organize the timers in Cactus Timer by dragging them, or you can sort them out alphabetically. - Save timers that you use every day by dragging them into the task list. -

When a timer is closed, you can archive the item into the archive list. - You can also export your archived timers to a text file that you can easily share with others. - You can also split the timer list into folders that will make it easier to organize timers. - You can create a group and assign it to a separate folder to stay organized.

NOTIFICATIONS: - Get timely and detailed notifications of time spent on the specific activity you want to track.

- There are 3 types of activities that can be tracked: Time Tracking, Time Switching, and Time Splitting. - You can tap on the notification to jump directly to that activity, or you can stay inside Cactus Timer and resume your work later. - No matter whether your device is connected or not, you will receive notifications even when your device is locked. - You can disable or enable specific activity notifications directly from the notification drop-down menu. - If you need to receive time tracking notifications only some of the time, you can easily setup
