[Evaluation of a 3D display of restenosis after percutaneous transluminal coronary angioplasty]. To evaluate and compare 3D visualization techniques after percutaneous transluminal coronary angioplasty (PTCA). Images were acquired with an X-ray system (a) in projection technique, and (b) by a real time 3D reconstruction technique using a single ESR scanner in twenty consecutive PTCA patients with known or suspected restenosis. Left and right coronary arteries were assessed in three projections (for each: crano-caudal, right and left anterior oblique). The images were analyzed by two blinded observers in a systematic order (projection, vessel and restenosis). Distal in-stent restenosis > 50% and quantification of luminal narrowing > 50% were considered significant restenosis. At ESR imaging 16/20 (80%) PTCA lesions showed restenosis: 2/16 (13%) in the right coronary artery, 14/16 (88%) in the left coronary artery. 3D reconstruction increased sensitivity to detect vessel territory restenosis: left and right coronary artery restenosis were detected in 15/16 (93%) and in 17/20 (85%) cases. The sensitivity to detect coronary artery restenosis increased to 93%; specificity remained high with the projection technique (96%, PPV 100%, NPV 88%). 3D reconstruction did not improve specificity. In PTCA restenosis after 3D reconstruction is more sensitive to detect vessel territory restenosis. Real time 3D reconstruction using a single ESR scanner is more useful than projection technique for the evaluation of restenosis after PTCA. Q: Updating nested list data when other list values change in python I am trying to make a recursive function that will search for any changes in nested lists and update them accordingly.
